

A Warm Welcome

to the

Antikburg Scharnitz

ca. 1900

The building, which the locals call the "Alte-Burg" (Old Castle), used to be the residence and later the former armoury and commandant's office of the "Porta Claudia" fortress.

This was a fortification between Tyrol and Bavaria commissioned by Claudia de' Medici, Archduchess of Austria and Princess of Tyrol, to protect against the advancing Swedes during the Thirty Years' War at the Scharnitz Pass and was therefore named after her.

In 1670 the fortress was extended and in 1703 it was occupied during the Bavarian Rummel. Partially destroyed and then rebuilt and extended.

Goethe described the border in 1786 in his travelogue to Italy as "closed with a rampart that bars the valley and joins the mountains".

In 1805, during Napoléon's campaign against Austria, the fortifications were besieged by French troops under Marshal Michel Ney. Led by Mittenwalders (Bavaria was on Napoléon's side), the French were able to bypass the fortification via a path leading sideways past the Grünkopf and stab the Austrians in the back. As a result, the fortification was captured. This path has been called the Franzosensteig ever since and can also be found under this name in today's hiking maps.

The oldest pen drawings date from 1610, where the building was described as a small castle - with a flat roof and four tower cores.

However, the walls, which are up to 2.50 m thick, suggest that the origin of this building goes back much further.
